EMENTA

In this course, students deconstruct the idea of democracy through cross-teaching by professors from different institutions located in different world regions. The course adopts a hybrid format, combining in-person teaching and participation via Zoom. One by one, the professors present scholarly work on democracy through the lens of their respective specialities, research traditions, and fields of study. Through the frameworks provided by the professors, students are invited to apply theoretical approaches to democracy and to differentiate between coexisting uses of the term.

The course theme allows each professor to develop a topic within their own area of expertise, while maintaining a shared concern with the localised production and transnational circulation of democratisation experiences and approaches to the concept of democracy. The course focuses particularly on popular representation, linking its central problematic to contemporary critiques of liberal democracy, whether theorised as “illiberal” or “populist”.
